TEACHING THE YOUNG IDEA.

In referring to the entertainments now being given in this country by a celebrated church choir from Rome, a writer in a New York paper expresses great surprise that the audiences in that city contained hundreds of very young boys and girls, many of them peopling the cheapest seats, showing that they had probably made considerable sacrifices to get there. Of the same tenor is a theatrical review concerning the revival of Shakespeare's plays in a New York theater by E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe, the critic referring with words of satisfaction to the great numbers of boys and girls of tender years who crowded into the top gallery, a section of the theater almost completely deserted during the past year or two, since the theatre took largely to the dangerously sophisticated type of drama, and music play.

There are two important truths concealed in these separate news items that possess great significance. In the first place the present day access to so many phases of information and along so many lines of life and thought offer a new problem in the education of the young. When our parents and grandparents were children the avenues of learning were confined largely to the home, and learning was obtained pretty much by rote. Parents were in those days almost the sole arbiters of what their children should or should not learn. Life was then considerably more sequestered and as a consequence the young people of that age entered manhood and womanhood unspoiled and ignorant of many things that today are familiar to the merest tots.

Accepting the fact that the modern young person is "exposed" today to all sorts of educational influences likely to form his character and direct his future, the question of what he sees, hears and learns becomes at once of paramount importance. Until he has reached the stage of adolescence the young person, whether he is being taught by conventional means or not, absorbs most of his education from what he sees, hears or comes in contact with outside of his book hours. As never before in the history of the American people, its young people are exposed to what life in the raw is teaching. Because this is an age of especial extravagance in all the forms of distraction and amusement, the wild scramble for recreation and the notorious freedom in providing for this spirit, the so-called "arts" become powerful aids in the education of the young. The liberties vouchsafed these young people, an almost complete absence of parental control and direction in the use of them, heighten the dangers that lie in these popular forms of relaxation.

The theatre and the music hall under present condition become actual schools, colleges and universities in which young people from the tenderest years to manhood and womanhood obtain a very large share of their education both in raggers and morals. All this comment leads to agreement and sympathy with the New York comments in which the eagerness manifested by the boys and girls of that city to hear good music and see instructive and artistically played dramas of classic value shows a growing desire for the best means of self education in the arts that are so badly abused these days. The public duty is to see that they have more opportunities to enjoy these things.

ANARCHY REARS ITS HEAD.

Literature signed by the "American Anarchistic Federated Commune Soviet," which has been seized by the New York police who are trying to find its authors, is entirely consistent with the anarchistic principle of "no laws of God or man."

It denounces the action of the police in dispersing a mob that attempted to march up Fifth avenue without an official permit. In the opinion of its authors, all persons should be privileged to get up demonstrations, even demonstrations against the government of the United States, and parade through the streets at any time regardless of the comfort and convenience of their fellow-citizens.

The circulars also contain an attack on judicial officers who are conducting the trial of some persons charged with "criminal anarchy" under a law recently passed by the New York legislature. These officers are specifically mentioned by name and violence against them is urged.

Coincidentally comes word from Gary, Ind., of the distribution of a proclamation by the "Communist Party of America" advocating the overthrow of the military forces now in control of that city.

No one with normal nerves is going to lie awake nights worrying for fear the anarchists will seize the government of the United States, make Debs or Berkman president and Emma Goldman secretary of war. The anarchists are creating a sensation entirely out of proportion to their numbers and influence.

But the serious mischief foreshadowed by the circulation of such printed threats and warnings must not be minimized. In New York the judiciary, in Gary the military, are threatened with death for doing their duty. The authorities are on guard and seeking to discover the perpetrators of these outrages.

All this is not enough. But good citizens have a duty to perform: To denounce manifestations of anarchy and where necessary to organize against these enemies within the gates.

The other day in New York when the mob defied the police loyal citizens joined actively in upholding the law. We may not all be required to render this physical service, but without exception we who believe in our country and its institutions should be prepared to render whatever assistance may be needed to expel this ugly serpent of anarchy from free America.

ALDERMAN TRUE

Alderman J. H. True's resignation from the council at this time when the city administration is confronted with important development problems is unfortunate. His ward, the second, is one of the centers in which much building activity is going on and a change in representation at this time, while it may not interrupt the city's part in providing adequate service to new householders, will perhaps, have a slight effect upon the progress until a successor is acquainted with the needs of that portion of the municipality.

"Jim," as he is familiarly known in the second, has won the confidence and respect of his constituents and has represented his ward in a thorough and satisfactory manner. His colleagues in the city's governing body will miss his counsel and ever-ready spirit of co-operation.

DECISION
I would not, if I could, grow great
And rob my children of their play;
I would not bid them stand and wait
For laughter till some other day;
I would not leave them here alone
To learn from strangers what is true,
The wealth of all the world to own,
The greatest deed on earth to do.

I would not build my fleeting fame
Upon my children's bitter tears,
And leave them fatherless to claim
Great wealth in far-off distant years;
I would not spare their pleas to know
The joys of childhood and be glad,
And let them unattended grow
For all the gold that could be had.

If while I romp with them in play
I lose the crown that I might wear,
Or fortune passes down the way,
I shall not be a slave to care.
For better poverty and strife
And little fame when I am old,
Than to have coined their joys of life
Into a selfish sum of gold.

It seems as to that Flume matter, our executive sided against Italy, because that secret treaty was for strategic purposes, and any such purposes he could not support as to a treaty. However, his support of Japan in which secret treaties were concerned, must have been for some other purpose. ## An Artist of Wounds

By FREDERIC J. HASKIN, Director
Janesville Daily Gazette Information Bureau,
Washington, D. C.

Washington, D. C., Oct. 13.—A case of chronic ivy poisoning, if you can view it without prejudice which we nearly all feel toward diseased states of human flesh, is really a beautiful thing. The affected hands swell up, and turn a clear, pale pink, deepening here and there to a rich scarlet, faintly mottled with yellow and streaked with little silvery drops of a liquid discharge, that rests upon a flaming red skin colors like dew drops upon a rose petal.

These reflections upon the beauty of ivy poisoning, which will not be appreciated by anyone who has had it, were provoked by a model of this painful affliction, made of wax and painted in natural colors by Capt. J. P. Wallis of the army medical museum. It is no exaggeration to say that if these wax hands were shown you projecting through holes in a curtain, and you took a look, while Dr. Wallis captures the tone and color of the living flesh. Furthermore, the Barretta models are falling to pieces. They do not stand the changes of temperature or exposure to sunlight. Dr. Wallis, by mixing talcum starch, and other substances with his wax, has produced models that are almost impervious to the changes of light and of temperature.

The value to the United States of this achievement of Dr. Wallis has been widely recognized. Le Matre, the famous French surgeon, pronounced these the finest models he had ever seen. Surgeon General Rupert Blue of the public health service, has endorsed the work of Capt. Wallis, and states that the public health service needs a collection of these models, but that the funds necessary for making such a collection are not available.

A movement is now on foot to have congress make an appropriation for the work. Unless this is done, the work will stop altogether. Dr. Wallis is a prominent dermatologist, cannot afford to retain much longer his position of Captain in the medical corps, now that the war is over. During the war, he had a number of pupils, including some of the best artists who had enlisted. Most of these have now been discharged, and the doctor has but a single pupil.

He Was Better at Portraits
Dr. Wallis found that finished artists were seldom able to make good models. Baker, the famous portrait painter, who enlisted in the army, was assigned to Dr. Wallis's office, but was wholly unable to do the work. He was accordingly transferred to the job of painting portraits of cabinet officers, at which he made it great success. It should be explained that this model-making does not require a real artist, but rather an extremely skillful artisan, working under the direction of a physician. The wax is not modelled. Instead a plaster of paris cast is made of the part which is to be reproduced. The hair and beard are plastered on the face is to be the subject, and quills are usually put in the patient's nose. At least, that was the European method. Dr. Wallis has found that if the patient will blow through his nostrils after the plaster has been put on, he can generally form a breathing hole. This is much better than the use of quills, as the quills tend to tickle the patient's nose, causing him to sneeze and blow the soft plaster cast to pieces.

When the plaster cast has hardened, an impression of it is taken on wax, and this wax impression is painted in the exact colors of the disease. This requires a very skillful and delicate use of color. An experienced artist of photographs is often more successful at this than an artist untrained in the use of oils on canvas.

Thus, in order to insure an adequate supply of wax models for this country the only thing necessary is to train a certain number of these artisans, in standardized methods. These trained operators could then be attached to medical museums and the universities, and could train others in the work.

Only One of His Kind
Dr. Wallis is now probably the only man in the United States who could do this work of training operators and standardizing methods. The medical fraternity, in and out of the government seem agreed that some way must be found of enabling him to do this.

The value of these wax models in diagnosing was well illustrated by the case of ivy poisoning with which this model was made. For example, there would have been no difficulty in making the diagnosis. Another case which occurred in the medical corps was that of a man who suffered from lichenplanus. This is a skin disease, chronic and generally considered incurable, which is so rare that the average practitioner would not see it once in a life time. Dr. Wallis made a model of this case of lichenplanus for the museum. This model was seen by a girl who was suffering from the disease, and she herself diagnosed her ailment, and came to Dr. Wallis for treatment.

In this case, the wax model enabled the trained person to recognize a disease which many a trained physician would have been unable to identify from mere descriptions and pictures. The value of these models in teaching medicine and to the practitioner in making diagnosis, scarcely needs emphasis. But good museums of such models are also of much interest to the public. For example, they may learn to recognize certain diseased states, and may be encouraged to avoid them. Dr. Wallis has made a series of models showing the changes of the skin in a life time. Dr. Wallis made a model of this case of lichenplanus for the museum. This model was seen by a girl who was suffering from the disease, and she herself diagnosed her ailment, and came to Dr. Wallis for treatment.

Records of Wounds Kept
To the army, the great value of wax modelling is for the preservation of records of wounds. For example, a certain method of treating gaping wounds has been worked out. It applies in certain cases and in others it does not. Dr. Wallis has made models of the wounds of the war, which can be healed by this method and what sort cannot. But for these models the appearance of such wounds would probably have been completely faded from the memories of men before the next war.

These models of gaping shrapnel and bullet wounds are among the most horrible and beautiful in the collection. Their colors are as fresh and bright as those of flowers. One of the most gruesome of these excruciating wounds is a large section of a man's leg which was amputated in Europe. Because it illustrated some important scientific fact, this piece of leg was pickled and shipped to the country of origin. It was kept in a barrel, much like corned beef. When it arrived it was put in a preservative solution. But specimens in such solutions are never satisfactory as they cannot be examined well, they change color and disintegrate, and the solution becomes cloudy. Accordingly, Dr. Wallis made a wax model of this piece of leg, which just as it was when it came out of the brine, and a singularly horrible looking affair it is. He also made a model of a large section of it, which looks exactly like a raw beefsteak, somewhat far gone.

Skin Diseases Represented
But these records of wounds are of interest chiefly to the army doctors. In addition to them, all of the hundreds of skin diseases can be exactly represented in wax, so that almost anyone may diagnose them. All of the eruptive diseases, such as chicken pox, small pox and scarlet fever can be represented by wax models. It is remarkable how often even experienced practitioners are unable to diagnose these diseases correctly. There are many other diseases which may be recognized by conditions of the skin. Hookworm and pellagra are among them. There are probably no diseases of which wax models are more urgently needed. Dr. Blue states that field workers for the public health service are often unable to recognize these diseases when they see them, although the appearance of the patients' skin is highly characterized.

There is also said to be a large field for the making of models of rare tropical diseases, of which there are a number that are almost unknown to medical science. Dr. Wallis has carried this art a step farther than any of his European predecessors by making models of diseased internal organs. When a diseased liver or kidney or spleen has been removed during an autopsy, the doctor makes its exact likeness to be a guide to surgeons forever after.

ON THE SPUR of the MOMENT

ROY K. MOULTON

A LITTLE SLICE OF LIFE.
The other day we decided
A momentous question.
It had been bothering us
For a good many months.
We had talked it over with
The wife and with
One or two intimate friends
And had consulted our banker
To see if he could invest
The amount of money necessary
Without danger of bankruptcy.
We had the children to think of.
Finally, we mustered up courage
And, with a cold chill creeping
Up our spine, we went
And bought that ton of coal.

It seems strange but whenever I go shopping with my wife for a hat something happens and we are not speaking on our way home. Just yesterday we strolled down among the avenue shops looking for something in gentlemen's hats. One's mind becomes perfumed sweetly strolling through the avenue shops and money becomes of no value whatever.

In one shop—I believe now they spelled it "shopp"—was a hat that was bottle green and had a three days' growth of whiskers or something like that. And I asked the clerk, "I wanted that hat, but my wife wanted one of those quiet things like a small town banker wears riding to work."

Well, anyway, I didn't buy the green hat. You know how it is. I didn't want to assert myself and create a scene. It was a hat when the clerk in me is aroused. So I bought the sedate and quiet little hat—a silly little thing that just seemed to be a copy of an old hat. When I put it on, instead of looking like a Lyndebcker model I looked like a rascal on last year's wedding cake.

But I don't care now. I'm going to the dogs anyway. I'm going to wear black ties, colorless shirts, and plain clothes and go to work. I wonder how I got that way and I can tell them it was because I married a woman who spoiled me individually. O. O. McINTYRE.

The building, No. 423, 1/2 block west of Chicago, burned entirely up while the excited man attempted to establish his identity over the telephone. ### THE LAST STAND OF THE HACK

In the good old days before gasoline came and alcohol went, Washington was famous for its hackney cabs. Most of these were built by Henry lines, and they were commonly equipped with a liveried black man on the front seat and a pickled white man on the back seat. At one time these one-horse-power taxis were numbered by hundreds; today they total about six, and these six are nearly always to be found in one place or another. There is where there is a little hack stand that is literally the last stand of the hack. Here you may still see the almost featureless, old-fashioned school wearing a purple coat, somewhat faded, and a dilapidated stove-pipe hat with a cockade in it.

Who ever hires these ancient rigs is a mystery; they are seldom seen in action. But they serve one excellent purpose. Whenever a Washington local newspaper man has a column or so of space to fill for a Saturday afternoon edition or a Monday morning one, and he cannot think of anything else to write about, he produces a Washington scribble on the decay of the Washington hacking industry. With a sob in every sentence, he recalls the good old days when a Washington scribble could find stronger inspiration than that afforded by a sentimental regret, and could always rely upon his favorite black cabman to supply him with a column of material.

Usually he picks up one of the old chaps who get in a cab and ordered the pilot to drive around and cool him off. When he waked up it was broad daylight, and the driver old it would be necessary to get a fresh horse if they were going to drive any further.

Usually, too, the reminiscent reporter recalls the delight of those long drives at three miles an hour through the empty streets of the city.

200 TO TAKE PART IN "KATCHA-KOO," AMATEUR PLAY

"Katcha-Koo," the coming amateur theatrical which is to be staged at the Myers theatre Tuesday and Wednesday, October 22 and 23, is attracting interest throughout the community. Over a hundred people are rehearsing the play in the evening. The mammoth production which is said to carry its own costumes and scenery, is slowly rounding into shape.

Over 20 dancing groups are featured in the production. The best local dancing talent has been chosen for these parts. Principal roles will also be in capable hands.

The leading role of the play will be taken by Dr. Irving Clark, who portrays the part of the "Katcha-Koo." Playing opposite him as Mrs. Chatter Gaddin, is Margaret Denning. A quartet of "wives" has also been chosen. Other taking lead parts are Hazel and Betty Gower, Edward and John Thiele, and Margaret Gately.

The play is styled an "Oriental-American Fantastique," with the first act being laid in Rastaput, India. This act is carried out in true Hindoo style, from the special scenery to the loving and chanting priests and slaves and vail dancers. The opening act is the very essence of the Orient.

The book and lyrics of the production are copyrighted by the producing company directing the local production. The play has been given the production over 1000 times. "Katcha-Koo" has met with unprecedented success in Portage, Sheboygan, and Beloit in this state, and following Janesville is booked in ten other Wisconsin cities, including Fond du Lac, Sturgeon Bay, Green Bay, and Madison.

News Notes From Movieland BY DAISY DEAN

Two years ago Baby Ivy Ward was just one of countless little children who found themselves orphans because of the European struggle. Ivy's daddy was killed in one of the first big battles, and her mother died when Ivy came into the world. Ivy was a pretty, looking little baby, happy and mischievous, not particularly interested in her own pitiful plight. But a Miss Agnes Allen was who adopted Ivy and brought her to New York.

Soon after their arrival Ivy appeared as a doll in a Metro production. Her part was so vividly natural, unspoiled, and so full of life that she was used with Bushman and Bayne, in Metro's serial, "The Great Secret." She has played with many screen celebrities since then—Ethel Barrymore, Mabel Taliaferro, May Allison and Nat Goodwin.

The little girl has reached the place where people look for a promising star. With a carefully continued training, she will very likely develop into a great actress, for she has great possibilities.

It was a strange coincidence that she should play the part of a Belgian orphan in one of Metro's big war plays, dealing with the fall of the kaiser. This part was so similar to Baby Ivy's own life that Miss Allen is going to keep a copy of the film to show her when she grows up.

"SMILING BILL" DIES SUDDENLY

The entire film world was shocked last week to learn of the sudden death of William (Smiling Bill) Parsons.

Death was due to diabetes, and although Mr. Parsons had been a sufferer from this malady for some time, his death was entirely unexpected.

The deceased was born in Middletown, N. Y. August 14, 1875, and was a direct descendant of William Winfield Scott. His early school days were spent in his home town, where he became a member of the University, where he was graduated from the school of medicine.

After working for a short time in Philadelphia under the famous surgeon S. Weir Mitchell, he decided to abandon medicine as a profession and turn his attention to life insurance, in which line he became very successful. He organized two of the

Emergency Contracts Await Liquidation

Washington, Oct. 18.—The war department still has on its hands 5,724 emergency contracts awaiting liquidation according to a report issued today. The sum involved aggregates more than $1,600,000,000 but the official schedule estimates that these contracts can be liquidated at a cost of $300,000,000.

Since the armistice 22,611 contracts have been settled with a total amount of 2,000,000,000 for which the government would be paid $309,000,000 in the final settlement.

After 14 years in this work he entered the motion picture field as "Smiling Bill" Parsons and from the first met with popularity in this line of endeavor. The "Smiling Bill" comedies had a wide appeal. They were clean and full of wholesome fun.

Exploiting Billie Rhodes, who became Mrs. William Parsons less than a year ago, has been his great mission in life. ## GOLFING TRAGEDY

London.—A player of Virvan links, Ayrshire, made a drive at his ball, and turning round the remark about the stroke to another player, Robert Trait, was amazed to find him lying unconscious at his feet. ## Heart and Home Problems

LETTERS MAY BE ADDRESSED TO MISS THOMPSON, IN CARE OF THE GAZETTE

Dear Mrs. Thompson: Do you think it proper for a girl of 22 to marry a man whom her mother does not like because he comes from a large family, this being the only reason she can find against him? Should she marry a man of her mother's choice whom she does not care for after three years of trying to be faithful while he is not faithful?

The first man I speak of is just an honest working man, and the latter has money. After telling my mother of my engagement she caused it to be broken. Now that I am engaged again, should I tell her, and if so still objects give him up?

I have been making my way for the last five years. I have always done as she wished and am now at a loss to know what to do. A. L. R.

Marry the man you love since your mother has no reasonable objection, but do not break it if she objects unless she can prove to you that he is undesirable.

Dear Mrs. Thompson: I am 13 and used to go with a fellow who is 26. He says he loves me and although I have not been with him for several weeks and barely speak to him, he still writes me and I have not answered his letters since we quit going together.

Why is it that he still writes to me? He wants to marry me. Should I or not? He has always treated me fine, but I don't believe I love him enough to marry him, which he has asked me to do several times.

What can I do to make him stop writing, as my folks do not like him, although they have never said anything when he comes to the house. I try to act angry at him, but in spite of all he is the same as usual—always has a friendly smile and a cheerful word whenever I pass him. Do as you like about meeting the young man for 15 minutes. If he still interests you, go, but if you seriously want to get rid of him do not see him or write to him again. After a while he will realize that you do not want to have anything to do with him and then he will stop annoying you. It is evident that he is very much in love with you. Now he is hopeful that he can win you again and so he continues to write.

Dear Mrs. Thompson: I am a girl of 17 and have a dear friend who is 16 years old and I think the world of her. I have been going around with her for the last year. This girl has a brother and every time I go or want to go to my friend's house my mother objects, saying that I go for her brother. That is not the case.

My mother is very strict with me and wants me to go around with my married sister and I don't care to go every place she does, and I am sure she doesn't want to take me.

Do you think she is right in depriving me of my girl friend? Do you think she is right in not letting me go over to this friend's house? Kindly tell me what to do. I happened to go out with the boy one Sunday and was caught. Since then my mother has forbidden me to go to my friend's house. If I tell them about mother not wanting me to go they will feel badly.

BROKEN HEARTED ELSTIE.

I am sure your mother's judgment is correct. Probably you talk about the boy more than you should and your mother knows it. If you analyze the situation I think you will find that you make most of the calls and your mother is justified in objecting.

She Married an Average Man

By ZOE BECKLEY.

It is past midnight. I have stolen from my room to work off some of my spiritual thrills in this little book of mine.

Christmas Eve! If I were a believer in the mystic I should think all sorts of necromancies were in the air tonight. I feel electric currents coursing through my body and my soul.

I am beside myself with the joy of going to New York. We leave day after tomorrow. I am standing at one of life's corners. Presently I shall turn round it into a new road, full of unknown possibilities, adventures, troubles, and joys without tally experiences that will enrich our whole existence.

Jim has been dearest itself for the last few days, and he has been sufficiently to take me into his confidence regarding our income and has voluntarily accorded me a regular allowance.

He and Belton, it seems, are equal partners in their contracting business, each to have a drawing account of $50 per week to begin.

That seems a heap of money to me! I am to have $25 to run the house on and to buy my personal things. He is to draw the check for the rent and I shall see to it that we do not pay more than $45 a month for the house.

The only fly in my ointment is the unpleasant fact that I owe this whole arrangement to Charles Belton. If it had not been for that discussion at dinner the other night Jim would never have granted my prayer to know our exact income and have a regular allowance.

It puzzles me that Belton has so much influence over Jim. The man is and always has been repugnant to me. And now I am actually under obligation to him!

He even called my attention to it in a veiled way, saying: "You see, lovely lady, that the lion can be tamed, though it may take an ogre to do it."

However, I shall not make myself unhappy. He may be as fine a man as Jim thinks him.

I cannot sleep tonight thinking of how life is opening before me! New York!!! I love merely to write the name and sit and gloat over it as standing for my future home.

My mother is very strict with me and wants me to go around with my married sister and I don't care to go every place she does, and I am sure she doesn't want to take me.

Paris Style Dictators Featuring Short Skirts, Abbreviated Sleeves

Paris skirts are still short. That they are full as well as short does not add to their grace. And that their ruffles reaches its widest dimensions over the hips is a statement that distinguishes the skirt of today from the skirt of yesterday.

But skirts are not the only things which designers have clipped off. Sleeves also are very abbreviated, some of them stopping absolutely at the shoulders while a few of the more conservative ones extend almost to the elbow and a very small number try to reach the wrist. Pictured are some of the newest creations from Paris shops.

These three frocks, for morning, afternoon and evening wear, are typical of what is new in Paris fashion. The afternoon gown is made of black velvet trimmed with loose panels of lace and tulle and bands of long white fur. It has the unusually short skirt, which is so common in France but which seems ridiculous to us here because of the prevailing mode for ankle length skirts. It also shows the low-necked, sleeveless mode which is so common in Paris. The evening gown is made of brown satin with gold brocade roses in an all-over pattern. Brown is becoming very fashionable every day and although it seems strange it is being worn for formal evening and afternoon affairs just as black has been heretofore. A gold lace giraffe and long train forms the only trimming. The gown is not only sleeveless but it is backless, thus adhering to the latest dictate of the hour. This fashion has not become popular in this country yet, but it may and it will become the slaves of fashion to start this season. The skirt is almost 14 inches from the ground, but the sleeves are long and tight, a very unusual deviation from the present rule of no sleeves. The lines of the frock are very simple and a dainty lingerie collar finishes the V-neck.

The morning frock is made of ivory white duvetyn trimmed with black velvet. There seems to be a typical of what is new in Paris fashion. The afternoon gown is made of black velvet trimmed with loose panels of lace and tulle and bands of of physicians who observed the epidemic in army camps and in civil life have ascribed its prompt death to the hands as conveyors of the infection. This theory, I say theory, because so far I know it has never been experimentally proved.

It is assumed that the individual with a respiratory infection (be it the "flu" or just an alleged cold or diptheria) who has unconsciously contaminated his fingers or hands many times in the day by bringing them to his mouth, and that the bacteria conveyed to the hands, survive long enough to pass to another person's hands in shaking hands and present to be conveyed unconsciously to his mouth. The theory also assumes that individuals with contaminated hands may contaminate door knobs, the rings of theater seats or car seats, and that in this way and thus indirectly infect persons who subsequently touch these things.

Personally I think the hand to mouth theory of infection is a far-fetched and unconvincing theory. And so far as infection from finger straps, seat arms, door knobs and the like is concerned, it is without a negligible danger if it ever really happens. It would be reasonable enough to carefully wash the hands with soap and water after handling such objects, and before the fingers are thoughtlessly brought to the mouth as a protection against infection with parasites such as the louse or the itch mite. These higher forms of life survive hours and days on inanimate objects. Ordinary harmless germs survive there too. But disease germs do not commonly survive many minutes away from their host.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

First question: How can I prevent or relieve flat feet? I am seventeen years old, and I have just begun to suffer with fatigue and some pain after being on the feet for a time. This has only occurred since.

ANSWER—First, adopt shoes built on the plan of the "ergonomic" which exaggerates the natural inversion of the foot, has an elastic or flexible shank and a wide, deep barefoot as much as possible. Always toe a little inward, never outward. Practice rising slowly as high as possible on the toes, toeing in, and then letting the weight slowly down, repeating as many times as each session as you can without fatigue. Often it is advisable for a young person developing such foot trouble to have the feet strapped up by a physician according to the Ochsner method for the first few weeks.

Answer to Charles G. 1. It is a normal condition. 2. It is a normal condition. 3. Such "specialists" are rarely worth the confidence. 4. Yes. Glad to send you the information by mail.

Evening Catarrh Myth. Please tell me if catarrh is a blood disease. I have been trying both internal and external treatment with no benefit. (T. J. M.)

ANSWER—Catarrh is not a disease at all. It is just a meaningless term applied in lieu of a diagnosis by a doctor who is too busy or too far away to determine what is really the matter. I can only advise you to quit going and coming to a competent doctor for examination.

SILK SUITS FOR MEN

London.—"Nucloth" is the name of a silk fabric just produced by a Puder manufacturer from the short ends of silk after the combs have extracted the long lengths. It is intended to meet the present demand for economical clothing. It is claimed for this cloth that it is untearable, equal in appearance and wear to worsted, yet can be sold at the price of shoddy. It is estimated that a boy's suit can be made for $9.75 and a man's suit for $16.75.

HANDS AND THE FLU

Although the Bacillus influenzae is rare but a chief of the bacterial forces responsible for last year's epidemic of influenza, there is no question of the bacterial origin of the disease or of the mode of conveyance in droplets of secretion from nose or throat which may carry up to 10 feet from the patient (coughing open-face or sneezing open-face) which would not ordinarily endanger persons who keep outside of the five-foot barrage (invisible spray of moisture given off by the patient talking).

This infection by droplets or spray in which the germs are suspended is obvious and too common to be forgotten for a moment. It is sufficiently ignored by health-ignorant persons to account fully for the spread of the "flu." If we bear in mind that no one has as yet discovered a positive method for diagnosing early or benign cases of influenza, it is not surprising that the isolation of which latter cases is so seldom insisted upon by busy doctors.

Spray or droplet infection, or at least the conveyance of known bacteria by that means from the nose and throat of one individual to the nose or throat of another, has been repeatedly demonstrated by actual experiment. Therefore, the idea is no mere "germ theory." But since the epidemic of influenza a number

THE COW PUNCHER

BY ROBERT J. C. STEAD
Author of
"Kitchen and Other Poems"
Copyright by Harper & Brothers

He reached for the telephone and rang her number.
Her number did not answer. He thought of Edith Duncan, but Edith lived at home, and it was much too late to extend a formal dinner invitation. There was nothing for it but to eat alone. He suddenly became conscious of the great loneliness of his bachelor life. The charm of bachelorhood was a myth which only need contact with the gentle atmosphere of feminine affection to be exposed. He took his hat and coat and went into the street. It was his custom to take his meals at a modest eating-place on a side-avenue, but tonight he directed his steps to the best hotel the city afforded. There was no wisdom in dressing for an event unless he was going to deflect his course somewhat from the daily routine of the dining hall and a blaze of light. Dave paused for a moment, awaiting the beck of a waiter, but in that moment his eye fell on Conward seated at a table with Mrs. Hardy and Irene. Conward had seen him and was motioning to him to join them. "The situation was embarrassing, and yet delightful," he was glad he had dressed for dinner.

"Join us Eiden," Conward said, as he reached their table. "Just a little dinner to celebrate today's friendship. You will not refuse to share to that extent?"
Dave looked at Mrs. Hardy. Had he been dealing with Conward and Mrs. Hardy alone, he would have excused himself, but he had to think of Irene. That is, he had to justify her by being correct in his manners.

"Do join us," said Mrs. Hardy. It would be correct for her to support Mr. Conward's invitation.
"You are very kind," said Dave as he seated himself. "I had not hoped for this pleasure." And yet the pleasure was not unalloyed. He felt that Conward had outplayed him. It was Conward who had done the gracious thing, and Dave could not prevent Conward doing the gracious thing without himself being ungracious.

After dinner they sat in the lounge room, and Conward beguiled the time with stories of sudden wealth which had been practically forced upon men who were now regretting the new framework of the country.

As these worthies strolled through the richly furnished room, leisurely smoking their after-dinner cigars, Conward would now and then summarize of their rise from rags to riches, from clerk or laborer to their present affluence, occasionally appealing to Dave.

It was particularly distasteful to Eiden to be obliged to add

Pleasant Fields Of Holy Writ

Fourth Quarter: Lesson III: Mark 1: 1-38, October 18, 1919.
Golden Text: Jesus said unto him, Today is salvation, come to this house. Luke XIX 9.

JESUS IN PETER'S HOME

It is by design and part of the disciples' training that a ministry in the home is put in immediate and striking contrast to the public ministry Jesus went to the synagogue in company with his followers and engaged in the solemn service, singing from the Hebrew hymnal, reading the scriptures appointed to be read, reciting the creed "Hear O Israel, The Lord thy God is one God," and worked a miracle of power. Then immediately he is in a private home, carrying all the grace and power of his public appearance into its quiet precincts. The same four who saw him in the synagogue see him now in Peter's dwelling. He is the same Christ, teacher and consoler of men.

Whatever the Master did was well done. So no tedious conversation succeeded the preaching of the "fever." The sick woman immediately places from her couch and prepares a savory meal for the company. It is a woman's natural token of gratitude. All unconsciously she gives convincing evidence of the perfection of Jesus' teaching. At the same time refreshes the Master and fortifies him for the great demand that is to be made upon him that very evening.

The meal finished before the street in front of Peter's house was converted into a hospital, and a silver bell whose notes of hope had sounded in every shadowed home, in obedience to its encouraging call, when the setting sun had absolved the people from their overstrained notions of Sabbath observance, came with confidence to him whose sovereign power had had such a conspicuous exemplification.

From one sufferer's mat to another, from one suffering to another, the people walked in the hastily-emptied parlor-living room under the stars. Nor did he desert as long as there were any who needed his aid.

Now we know how Capernaum was lifted to heaven in point of privilege, and how the exhibition of Jesus' power, in a single night, every malevolent demon was expelled, every demoniac was cured, every man and woman who suffered from the power of sin, those mighty works produced no general or lasting faith in Jesus, the Messiah, Capernaum's doom was deserved. One fairly hears the Master's stern words, still waking the echoes of her desolation. "Thou hast brought down to hell."

That day in Capernaum was Jesus' whole life in miniature, work, teaching, suffering, and death. He came to die, and he came to give his life. He gave it all.

THE TEACHER'S LANTERN
The English layman, James Moore, has just completed his new book, "The Teacher's Lantern." It is significant that one of the most conservative of our religious denominations should have a book for the Christian church is committing part of its function when it talks to minister to the needs of the world as well as of men.

Quiet orderliness characterized his meetings. He avoided publicity. He warned his patients not to expect immediate results and advised them to continue the medicine their physicians had prescribed, saying, "I am not a doctor, but a teacher."

He was called a "medium of Christ for health" rather than a "healer." His aim is to revive faith and the words of the Bible, and that he is on the side of health not of sickness.

When a woman was asked whether she believed in faith or medicine, her quick and witty answer was "I believe in cure by faith—and medicine."

Mrs. Mary Ann, formerly of Kansas, and her husband, Mr. Promised Land, gave a graphic and pathetic account of her escape from the tyranny of the Pharisee Sabbath, when, on a certain Sabbath day, she determined, contrary to her training to carry a burden, namely, her handkerchief (1) to the field and (2) to the Sabbath school.

She passed out of the door, further on the sidewalk. Nothing happened! She walked to the corner and returned, emancipated forever from the traditions of men concerning the Sabbath. It was part of Jesus' mission to set men free from this tyranny. He did it by doing deeds of mercy and love.

Of set purpose he broke the traditions which men had strung upon the thread of God's law, but he never broke the thread of the Sabbath. Jesus went to church. It is recorded to have been his custom. Both synagogue and Sabbath were his.

But he used them for the purpose for which they were instituted. He never made a fetish of them. The Sabbath day, the synagogue at Capernaum indicated that it was a marble building and highly ornamented. It may have been of gold, but it was not of gold.
